

The World I Envision

Although there has been a significant increase in the opportunities that the girls of today have access to, the actual implementation of these opportunities remains hindered by societal norms and invisible cobwebs that entrap the dreams of girls in an immaculately complex social structure. The typical communal belief of considering girls to be at a lower pedestal than men is being fuelled nowadays to such an extent that our society has become such where girls' progress is restricted by tracted orthodoxical restrictions. Their dreams are crippled and crushed under this unnecessary societal mindset, even when they form half of this very society.

To invest in a better future for girls does not mean forming continuous policies without ensuring their actual implementation. It means to foster a communal perspective which inculcates a belief in girls' ability to innovate, lead and achieve. It means ensuring a community where each girl can walk freely through the streets, without fearing anyone. It means to pave a world where girls' healthcare is not a privilege but a right and where they are enriched with not only knowledge but wisdom.

I envision a world for girls, where they awaken to their true flair, thinking of the world to be a blank canvas, waiting for them to paint it with the true colours of joy and equality ; colours as bright and luminous and bold as their dream, a world where girls are not held back from unleashing their true potential and a world where every girl can freely express her views, without being bound by the man-made complexities and restrictions that plague today's society; a world where every girl embraces her worth without hesitation and where her ideas, her talents, her opinions are not met with judgement, superfluent impostions or oppression but with admiration and respect.

Japneet